History comes alive through the ghosts of Downtown Sanford this October. As you embark on a frightful but fun night of restaurant and brewery hopping, you will encounter four spirits...each with a tale to tell.

Carthage Street starts your stroll, and you are sure to encounter Ernest Badgett, renown ghost of the Temple Theatre, and former set designer, who makes his way between the theatre and his former home on Gulf Street.

Turn to Steele Street and steel yourself for the ghost of Lee McIver, owner of Lee Furniture store who took his own life to save his family's fortune.

Feeling a little warm? Perhaps it's the long lost ghost of the police chief who died in the last century following a catastrophic fire at the current site of Hugger Muggler Brewing.

Hear that train whistle? We can always count on The Tuckers at The Railroad House Museum to stir up a little ruckus.

Find some comfort in our culinary tour as you visit each stop for a moment of sanity and safety!

Steele Street Lee McIver

By all accounts, Lee McIver was a simple man who loved three things above all else: his family, his business, and his beloved hometown of Sanford.

He lived his whole life here, and as the unlucky few who've managed to catch a glimpse of his ghost can tell you, his entire afterlife as well. In fact, many a Sanford native knows that being deceased has never stopped some folks from sticking around and turning up in places you'd least expect them to.

So, throw back a glass of liquid courage at La Dolce Vita Pizzeria before embarking on a delightfully dark romp of diligence and desperation.

Wicker Street Chief McKernan

In the days leading up to his passing, Fire and Police Chief John T. McKernan was burning the candle at three ends and getting worn out in the process. As fatigue set in, John started to make mistakes that seemed small but when added together would lead to a great calamity.

First mistake: John signed off on a decision to close the downtown firehouse and consolidate the crew with another station further outside of town. Second mistake: he let a young impressionable man off with a warning after catching him trespassing around a large tobacco warehouse that once stood where Hugger Muggger stands today. Third mistake: John had ordered much-needed repairs to begin immediately on key fire hydrants along Wicker St.

Just past noon on a Saturday, the chain reaction of those three mistakes would kick off the most spectacular fire ever witnessed in Sanford's history.

Carthage Street Ernest Badgett

As the age-old Shakespeare saying loosely goes, all the world's a stage and we're merely players making entrances and exits. Each person in their own time gets the opportunity to play as many parts as they can.

One can certainly say that this applied to Ernest Badgett whose entrance into this world was just as remarkable as his untimely exit. But, as many a Sanford native can attest, being deceased has never stopped some folks from sticking around and turning up in places you'd least expect them to.

So, steel yourself and gather your wits about you as we set off on an adventure of fame and glory, show business and showmanship. SCAN THE CODE TO HEAR MORE...

Chatham Street The Tuckers

Not much is known about W. T. Tucker and his wife Inder Virginia Squire – the influential twosome who helped shape and build the town of Sanford in its early days.

What is very much alive and well, which is more than we can say for “Billy” and “Indie” as the townsfolk called them, are the ghostly stories of how the dearly departed couple still makes their presence known here in Downtown Sanford.

As many a Sanford native knows, being deceased has never stopped some folks from sticking around and turning up in places you'd least expect them to. So, take a moment to gather up your courage before we embark on a dark and shadowy tale of love and ambition.
